

LISTENING

#02

1- Listen to a customer placing a custom drink order with a barista. Answer the questions to show you understand the details of the order, substitutions, and special requests, and practice reflecting on the conversation.

Your Drink, Your Way: Talking to the Barista

1 - What is the name of the store?

2 - Who is the customer placing the order for?

3 - What exactly is the “extra pump”? (Be specific about the flavor or ingredient.)

4 - The store is out of oat milk. Was the customer offered any options to substitute it with? (If so, what were they?)

5 - How much does the drink cost?

True or False: The drink costs $100.

6 - How did the customer greet the fast-food worker?

7 - Why do you think the customer said, “That was a goofy thing”? (Explain in your own words.)

8 - Did the customer agree to use a different type of milk? (Yes or No. If yes, which type?)

9 - What does the customer’s daughter want an extra pump of?

The Dinner Order

Emma had been working late at the office, and by the time she stepped out, the city was already glowing with neon signs. Her stomach growled, reminding her that she had skipped lunch entirely. Instead of heading straight home, she decided to stop by La Trattoria, a small but elegant Italian restaurant tucked away on a quiet street corner.

As soon as she walked in, the warm aroma of roasted garlic and freshly baked bread welcomed her. A waiter in a crisp white shirt greeted her with a polite smile.

“Good evening, ma’am. Table for one?”

“Yes, please,” Emma replied, placing her coat over her arm.

She was shown to a cozy corner table. The lighting was dim, creating a calm and intimate atmosphere. A leather-bound menu was handed to her, and she began to scan through the options. There were so many tempting choices: handmade pasta, wood-fired pizza, and an entire section dedicated to seafood.

When the waiter returned, he stood attentively, pen poised.

“Have you decided, or would you like a recommendation?” he asked.

Emma hesitated. “Actually, I’d love a recommendation. What would you suggest?”

The waiter nodded thoughtfully. “Our linguine with clams is quite popular, and the mushroom risotto has been praised by many. But if you’re in the mood for something lighter, the grilled salmon with lemon butter sauce is excellent.”

Emma closed the menu. “The risotto sounds perfect. I’ll have that, please. And could I also get a glass of red wine—something full-bodied?”

“Certainly,” the waiter replied. “May I suggest our house Merlot? It complements the risotto beautifully.”

“Wonderful. I’ll trust your judgment,” Emma said with a smile.

After he left, Emma leaned back in her chair, enjoying the soft music and the clinking of cutlery around her. She realized that ordering food was never just about eating—it was an experience, a ritual that connected flavors, choices, and conversations into something memorable.

When the risotto finally arrived, steaming and fragrant, she knew she had made the right choice. The first bite was creamy, earthy, and utterly satisfying. Emma smiled to herself. Sometimes, the simplest decisions—like where and what to eat—could transform an ordinary evening into something extraordinary.
