City life VS Country life

The countryside? It must be nice if you're retired ... or dead. If you want to have a semblance of a social life and like to do wild things like, oh, going to the cinema on a Monday night, the city is for you.

1. Walking. It's a thing. Living in the city means that walking is often an option. There are still plenty of other possibilities such as shared and Uber rides.
2. You will never be the underdog. It sucks to be the odd one out. There's something for everyone.
3. The entire world is (almost) on your doorstep. You can order anything from online stores and – miracle! – receive it the next day.
4. It teaches you tolerance. The world is a diverse place – and in the city, you learn that fast.

Big city glamor? Balderdash. Try big city cost. If you want to live like a king (or at least be your own landlord), move to the country.

1. There's space – for you, for your dog, for your kids, between you and your annoying neighbors blasting bad music through loudspeakers. In the country, you have something called a yard and other two called peace and quietness.
2. There are no billionaires. And frankly, few millionaires. To put it another way, there's a lot less income inequality. Nobody cares about what kind of clothes you're wearing.
3. You aren't reliant on public transit. You can drive yourself where you want, when you want. You are in control, and there's plenty of (free) parking.
4. You don't get suspicious when people are nice to you. People say hello and "how are you" and generally mean it. You feel a part of a genuine community, not just one peon out of millions.
