COOKING MASHED POTATOES

It was Sunday afternoon, and Daniel had invited a few friends over for dinner. He decided to cook something simple but comforting: roasted chicken with mashed potatoes. The chicken was already in the oven, filling the kitchen with a delicious aroma, but the potatoes still needed work.

He washed a bag of Yukon Gold potatoes, peeled them, and cut them into even chunks. “The trick,” he muttered to himself, “is making sure they cook evenly.” He dropped the pieces into a pot of cold salted water and set it on the stove.

A few minutes later, his roommate, Claire, walked in.

“Smells amazing in here,” she said. “Need help?”

“Actually, yes. Can you grab the butter and milk from the fridge? They need to be warm when I mix them in—otherwise the potatoes get gluey.”

When the potatoes were fork-tender, Daniel drained them and returned them to the hot pot to steam off the excess water. He mashed them carefully, then added the melted butter and warm milk. The texture turned creamy and smooth, just the way he liked it.

“Taste this,” he said, offering Claire a spoonful.

She smiled. “Perfect—creamy, buttery, with just the right amount of salt. Your friends are going to love this.”

Daniel grinned. Mashed potatoes might be simple, but done right, they felt like pure comfort on a plate.
