READING COMPREHENSION

The Art of Packing Light

When Sofia got her visa to study abroad for a year, she was thrilled. But as the departure date got closer, she began to panic about one thing: packing. Her bed quickly disappeared under piles of clothes, shoes, and souvenirs she thought she might need. “How can I fit my whole life into one suitcase?” she wondered.

Her older brother, who had traveled before, gave her some advice. “Pack for the life you’re going to live, not the one you’re leaving behind.” At first, Sofia didn’t understand, but she started thinking about her daily routine in the new country. She would be walking to class, cooking for herself, and exploring the city on weekends. Slowly, she began removing unnecessary items from the pile.

She kept only comfortable jeans, two sweaters, a warm jacket, and clothes she could mix and match. For formal occasions, she added one dress and a pair of classic shoes. Remembering how unpredictable spring weather could be, she left room for an umbrella and a light raincoat.

When she finally zipped her suitcase, it felt surprisingly light. She realized that packing light wasn’t just about clothes—it was about mindset. Traveling with fewer things meant more freedom. At the airport, watching other passengers struggle with heavy luggage, she smiled. She carried everything she needed, and nothing more.

A few months later, Sofia didn’t miss any of the things she had left behind. Instead, she collected memories, not objects. Packing light had taught her an unexpected lesson: sometimes, the less you bring, the more space you have for new experiences.
