Neighborhood Barbecue

Every summer, people in Greenfield Street organize a big neighborhood barbecue. It started as a small gathering ten years ago, but now almost every family on the block joins. Each person brings something to share — some prepare meat like juicy burgers and sausages, others bring fresh salads, sweet desserts, or refreshing drinks. Many families also bring special dishes from their own culture, making the event even more interesting.

This year, the barbecue took place in Mrs. Lopez's spacious backyard. She has a large garden with long wooden tables, colorful lights hanging from the trees, and small decorations on each table. Mr. Carter was in charge of the grill again, carefully cooking burgers, sausages, and fresh corn. The delicious smell of food filled the air, and even the children offered to help by carrying plates, napkins, and cups.

While the adults talked, laughed, and shared stories, the kids played soccer and tag on the green lawn. Around sunset, someone turned on music, and a few people started dancing while others clapped and cheered. The atmosphere was warm, friendly, and lively — it felt more like a happy family reunion than just a simple barbecue.

At the end of the evening, Mrs. Lopez thanked everyone for coming and said that these small gatherings made their neighborhood special. Everyone agreed that the Greenfield barbecue wasn't just about food — it was about friendship, kindness, laughter, and creating memories together.
