READING COMPREHENSION

A New Company's First Presentation

Megan was nervous before her first big presentation. She had just started working as the Marketing Manager at a small tech company called BrightPay, which developed online payment systems for small shops. Her boss asked her to give a presentation to a group of potential clients.

She arrived early to check the projector, her slides, and the sound. When the visitors walked in, she smiled and welcomed them politely. "Good morning, everyone. Thank you for coming," she began. Her voice was calm, but inside she felt her heart racing.

Megan started by telling them about the company's history. It had been founded only three years earlier, but had already gained attention for its easy-to-use and safe payment tools. Then, she moved on to explain their main product — a mobile app that allowed small stores to receive payments instantly.

As she continued, she noticed that everyone was paying attention. They asked questions, took notes, and looked impressed by the simplicity of the system. When she finished, her boss smiled and said, "Great job, Megan. You made everything clear and professional."

After the meeting, several clients approached her to discuss possible partnerships. Megan felt relieved and proud. She realized that giving a good presentation wasn't only about knowing the facts — it was also about confidence, preparation, and connecting with the audience.
