READING COMPREHENSION

First Day at the Paris Office

It was Ana's first day at the company's Paris branch. She had come from the Madrid office, where she had worked for two years in the marketing department. When her manager told her about the opportunity to spend a few months in Paris to support the local team, she didn't think twice. She packed her bags and got ready for a new adventure.

As soon as she arrived at the Paris office, Ana noticed how different it was from the one in Madrid. The workspace was modern and colorful, and she could hear people speaking both French and English all around her. It felt energetic and international.

Her new supervisor, Claire, introduced her to everyone. "This is Ana, our new marketing coordinator from Madrid," she said. "She'll be helping us with our new product campaign." The team greeted her warmly, and one of her colleagues, Marc, offered to show her around.

They visited several departments, and Ana asked a lot of questions. She learned that the design team worked directly with clients, while the communications department was in charge of the company's social media presence and online events.

At lunch, Marc invited her to a café near the office. They talked about Parisian life, the culture, and even joked about how expensive coffee was in the city. Ana listened carefully, trying to catch some French words she had studied before coming.

By the end of the day, she felt tired but proud. The day had been long, but she had already learned so much. She realized that working abroad was not only about improving her skills, but also about growing as a person. As she left the office, she smiled — tomorrow, she would try to order her coffee in French.
