READING COMPREHENSION

New Policy at Work

When the company where Rachel works announced a new “peer mentoring program,” the idea sounded positive at first. The goal was to help employees from different departments learn from one another. Managers said it would create stronger teamwork and better understanding across the company.

However, when the first meeting was held, many workers were confused about what the program actually meant. Some thought they would have to train managers, while others believed they would just attend extra sessions after work. The communication wasn’t clear, and people started worrying about how much time it would take.

Rachel liked the idea of sharing knowledge, but she was also worried. Her regular tasks already filled her schedule, and she didn’t see how she could fit another weekly meeting into her calendar. She talked with a few coworkers, and most of them felt the same way.

Eventually, the HR department sent an email explaining that the program would be optional, at least for the first few months. That made people relax a bit. When the pilot started, only a few employees joined, but they gave positive feedback later. They said they’d learned a lot about other departments and developed new friendships.

Rachel decided to join the second round. She was paired with someone from the IT team and quickly realized she’d been too worried before. The sessions were informal, short, and actually fun. She learned some useful digital tools, and her partner said he’d learned about communication strategies from her. What began as a stressful idea ended up improving everyone’s mood and teamwork.
