READING COMPREHENSION

The Neighborhood Picnic

Every summer, the residents of Green Street would organize a picnic at a small park near the neighborhood. It was a simple tradition, but everyone enjoyed it. Families brought food, children played games, and neighbors had the chance to spend time together.

This year, Renata volunteered to organize the food. At first, she thought the task would be easy. However, more than forty people planned to attend, and some guests had special dietary needs. Two people were vegetarian, one child could not eat nuts, and several families wanted to bring the same dessert.

To keep everything organized, Renata created an online list. She divided it into main dishes, side dishes, drinks, and desserts. People could write their names beside the items they wanted to bring. This prevented everyone from bringing cake while forgetting important things like water, bread, or salad.

Renata also asked each family to confirm how many people would attend. At the previous picnic, the organizers had prepared food for thirty guests, but almost fifty people arrived. They ran out of hamburgers and soft drinks before the afternoon was over.

On the morning of the event, Renata arrived early with her brother. They arranged the tables, filled large containers with ice, and prepared a separate area for vegetarian dishes. Renata also placed labels beside food that contained nuts or milk.

The picnic was a success. There was enough food for everyone, and the weather remained pleasant all afternoon. At the end of the day, the neighbors helped clean the park. Renata felt tired, but she was pleased that her planning had prevented the problems they experienced the year before.
